Welcome our New Advisor – Moises Orozco Villicaña!

Sociology Advising and Dr. Holtzclaw-Stone are happy to introduce the latest addition to our staff – Mr. Moises Orozco Villicaña. Moises joins us after most recently advising on a semester at sea program. Prior to that, he worked as an advisor in Access and Achievement in the College of LAS. We are excited about all of the talent and experience that “Mo” brings to the position, please stop in and say hello to your new advisor sometime this Fall.

Welcome Back to Lincoln Hall!

The Sociology Department (as well as the College of LAS and the Department of Communication) have all moved back to Lincoln Hall. The main Sociology office is Room 3116, while Sociology Advising is Room 3070 (located near the elevator off Wright Street). Faculty offices are located in the hallways stretching between 3116 and 3070.

The College of LAS is located on the Second Floor, and is only accessible on the quad side of the building. Please drop in and check out our new space.

Sociology 396
2012-13 Fall/Winter Course Abroad

Environmental Issues, Health, and Global Justice in the Developing World
Morocco

Application Deadline:
September 10, 2012

The overall focus of this study abroad course is health, development, and global justice. As part of this 3-credit course abroad, students will participate in on-campus class meetings for the last 8 weeks of the Fall 2012 semester and will spend 10 days during winter break (January 2 to January 12, 2013) in Morocco. The purpose of the program to Morocco is to gain some basic familiarity with a developing country and with the complex challenges involved in development. While in Morocco, students will visit the cities of Fez and Chefchaouen. In each location, students will participate in meetings at and excursions to local organizations. These visits are designed to provide background information into Moroccan culture and insight into one specific challenge related to development: health care. Students will also be responsible for completing assigned readings on the ethics of development, health care, and global justice. Following daily planned activities, there will be discussions centering on development and global justice and their implications in the context of Morocco.

Students can take one course: Undergraduates can take PHIL 380 OR SOC 396, and Graduates can take PHIL 583 OR SOC 562. Once you have started an application for this program, there will be a questionnaire on your application where you will indicate which course you are interested in enrolling in. Official course registration will not happen until after you have been accepted to the program.

Students who are accepted to this program are REQUIRED to take one of these courses (PHIL 512/435, SOC 496, 596) in Spring 2013.

SOC 496, Race, Class & Gender
Mondays from 12:30pm-3:20pm.

This course has several objectives:
To provide guided readings on multiple systems of domination and resistance.

To explore possible approaches to scholarship on the intersections of race/ethnicity, gender, class, sexuality and other dimensions of oppression and liberation and the implications of a commitment to attention to these intersections.

To foster dialogue that will contribute to a departmental focus on inequality scholarship in sociology and related programs and departments.

To help students formulate research topics connected to broad scholarly debates in these areas of inquiry.

Law and Society: Sociology 396

Instructor: Rebecca L. Sandefur, Assistant Professor of Sociology and Law

- How does the justice system really work? How much do laws matter?
- What does law have in common with organized crime?
- Why does the US put more people in prison than any other similar nation?
- What are the jobs of lawyers, judges, and police officers really like?
- What creates contemporary challenges like mass incarceration, bias in the justice system, and lack of access to justice? How can we respond?

LAW AND SOCIETY examines law and legal institutions by drawing on insights from sociology and social psychology. We begin with an introduction to theoretical perspectives on the problem of order, illustrated by juxtaposing formal law with other means of achieving order, like organized crime. We then move to considering law and legal systems in action, including relations between law and the economy, inequality, culture, ideology and social change. Finally, we investigate the relationship between law’s aims and principles, and law’s real-world implementation.

Illinois Business Consulting

Why should I join Illinois Business Consulting?
As a result of the client base that IBC has established, students have a wide-range of networking opportunities that lead to summer internships and full-time employment after graduation. The professional staff provides training and development that gives members a significant advantage when competing for any internship or full-time job. IBC members are able to tell potential future employers about creating economic value, solving problems, and working on a team for a real-world client. If you are looking to expand your professional networking base, develop technical and communication skills, gain real world consulting experience, and improve your opportunities for employment, please apply online at www.ibc.illinois.edu <http://www.ibc.illinois.edu> by September 3rd, 2012. You will be notified via email about an interview soon after you apply. Interviews will take place during the first 2-3 weeks of classes.

What is Consulting?
Consulting is a valuable tool that organizations use in which an external organization is contacted to assist the client in improving their performance through the analysis of existing organizational issues, as well as the development of plans for improvement and growth. Those who work in the consulting industry have a wide range of backgrounds depending on the area of expertise that the company specializes in.

What is Illinois Business Consulting?
IBC is the largest student-run consultancy in the country, conducting 60-70 business consulting projects each year for established organizations of varying sizes (Fortune 500 to small businesses, both for-profit and nonprofit). Illinois Business Consulting works with real-world clients by assembling teams of 5-6 consultants, 1 project manager, and 1 senior manager from a wide-variety of backgrounds to take on a complex, challenging project that the client currently faces. Throughout the project, students have the opportunity to interact with management of the respective client, as well as communicate their findings in a final deliverable.

Who can join Illinois Business Consulting?
Since our clients have a wide-range of projects, the skill set that is needed for consulting teams is very diversified. As a result, students of all majors, undergraduate and graduate, are invited to apply.
